

BUMP!

1. Determine which topics/skills you need to review with your students. Create 5-7 quick review activities with easy-to-follow directions. Each of the activities should be able to be completed in about 3 minutes.
2. Set up stations around the room- one station for each activity. The stations should be spaced far enough apart that it is not easy for students to hear other group's answers. Make sure you place the questions face down at each station.
3. Divide your class into groups of 3 or 4 students and distribute a blank sheet of notebook paper or answer sheet with enough spaces for each of the stations.
4. Send each group to a starting station and instruct them not to flip over the questions until you give the word.
5. Tell students that as soon as they have completed and written down each answer their group must call out "Bump!"
6. When "Bump!" is yelled out, all students must turn over their questions and stop writing. At that point students will move clockwise to the next station- instruct them that they may not turn over the paper until you say go.
7. Determining the winner: It is not who gets the most answers, but who gets the most answers correct! Assign a group prize and review what they noticed at each station and have them share something new that they learned and how their team worked together.
